Q&A

01

Casting Process

Our Factory in India uses the age-old technique of Lost Wax Casting to create the finest quality mounts and hardware. Lost Wax Casting dates back some 3000 years. Today with the help of technology, it is used to create almost all our brass hardware. Forms for handles, mounts and sculpture are hand carved by skilled artisans in wax. This wax is used to create a ceramic mould and into this mould is poured the molten brass. The Lost Wax casting technique allows hardware of incredible detail to be created. The end result is always an individually produced and unique piece of brass of unsurpassed quality.

Lacquer Process

A practice from China dated back to the legendary times, black & red lacquer coats were used for utensils, vessels and black and red interiorsinterior elements. To achieve consistent and smooth finish throughout the material High pressure air is applied, mixed with paint particles. This process of Spray painting is commonly known as Factory applied finish or Lacquering.

02

Glazing Process

Glazing is a technique that can be dated to 8th/9th century B.C. It grew from the practice of glazed pottery. Glazing was discovered and practiced in China, Egypt, Mesopotamia and Greece. In woodworking, glazing involves applying a thin, translucent coat of colour between two clear finishes. This practice enables the craftsman to create "antique" look in new furniture, and gives control over the final desired colour and appearance of the wood.

05

Pin Routing Process

Achieve the delicacy of fine furniture A pin router is a great way to carve out decorative reliefs, custom-fitted recesses and signs. This practice translates indriya's vision into timeless and detailed pieces of furniture.

03

Hammering & Forging Process

Forging is one of the oldest practiced techniques of humankind. While using fire for their own survival man soon realised that fire can shape metals like gold, silver, copper, lead and pewter. Today metal can be hammered, pressed or rolled into shape by the technique of forging to achieve any desired form. This process is used in our furniture at Indriya to highlight and create unique features to a base, arm or top.

06

Ripping Process

Ripping refers to cutting the wood along its grain for a lengthwise cut.

07

Tenoner

A traditional tenoner is a floor-mounted machine tool, with pairs of cutting heads to shape the tenon. The workpiece is securely clamped to a chassis on rails, and pushed by hand to carry the wood through the cutters.

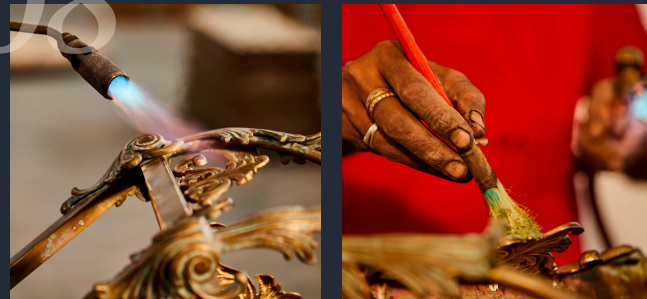

10

Grinding Process

In furniture manufacturing, grinding smooths surfaces and removes imperfections from wood, metal, or composites using abrasive tools or machines. This process ensures uniformity, enhances durability, and prepares surfaces for treatments like painting. It's crucial for achieving high-quality finishes, refining joints, and ensuring precise component fits.

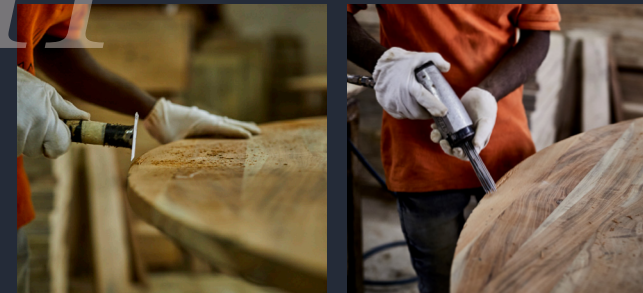

08

Verdigris Process

Verdigris is the common name for blue-green, copper, based pigments that form a patina on copper bronze, and brass. It was originally made by hanging copper plates over hot vinegar in a sealed pot until a green crust formed on the copper. Another method, used in the Middle Ages, was to attach copper strips to a wooden block with acetic acid, then bury the sealed block in dung.

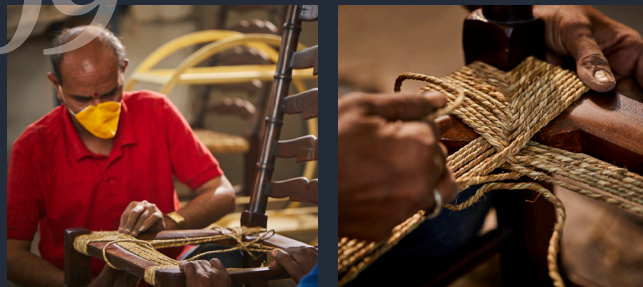

11

Wood distressing Process

To achieve a weathered-rustic effect to furniture giving it an age old timeless appeal. Distressing is done by hand, using tools or chemicals to add enough imperfections to provide age and character.

09

Weaving Process

Weaving furniture constructed from weaving natural or synthetic materials to form a fabric like structure. Furniture created in woven material is also durable in the outdoors wicker, webbing, rush & straw are also classified as a weave.

12

Lamination Process

In furniture manufacturing, lamination involves bonding layers of materials, such as wood veneers or plastic sheets, to a core substrate using adhesive and heat or pressure. This process enhances durability, improves appearance, and provides a protective surface, resulting in high-quality, resilient, and visually appealing furniture pieces.
